

CONTENTS

PART I.—THE THEORY OF NATURAL RIGHTS.

CHAPTER	PAGES
I. THE PRINCIPLES OF '89	3-19

The "Rights of Man" not first proclaimed in the French Declarations, 3; already formulated in America, 4; the Virginia "Bill of Rights," 4, 5; these principles derived from Locke, 6; implicit in Protestantism, 7; Wycliffe and John Ball, 8; the "Levellers," 8, 9. Transition from historical to "natural" rights among English Puritans, 10; among American colonists, 10, 11; natural rights pictured as quasi-historical, 11-13.

The appeal to Nature is (1) an appeal against external authority, 13; and (2) an appeal to the judgment of the individual, 14. The theory of natural rights may become the creed of the Anarchist, but also of the Conservative individualist, 14-16; how revolutionary creeds become conservative—the dialectic movement of history, 16-18; illustration from Calvinism, 18, 19. Plan of following chapters, 19.

II. ON THE HISTORY OF THE IDEA OF "NATURE" IN LAW AND POLITICS	20 47
--	-------

Ambiguity of the word "natural," 20. The Greek Sophists the forerunners of the eighteenth century Rationalists, 21-25; the antithesis of "nature" and "convention," 24-27. Aristotle's conception of nature, 27; his different uses of the term, 28; examination of passages that seem to contain the idea of a "law of nature," 29-32. The Cynics, and their "return to nature," 32, 33. The Stoic conception of nature, 33-35. Cicero, 35, 36. Roman Law, 36, 37; jus naturale and jus gentium, 38. Influence of Roman legal ideas on Western thought, 38, 39; Thomas Aquinas, 39, 40; the Roman conception of jus naturale favourable to legal reform, 40, 41; its influence on International Law, 41; on politics and ethics, 41. The "State of Nature" in Hobbes, Locke, Pope, Rousseau, 42-44. "Natural Theology" (in Adam Smith, etc.), 44, 45. Influence of Natural Science on Mr. Herbert Spencer, who defends "natural rights," 45, 46. "Biological rights," 46, 47.

- III. ROUSSEAU AND ROUSSEAUISM 48-70
- Rousseau's opinion of civilisation in his Contrat Social contrasted with that in his earlier writings, 48-51. "Rousseauism"—the "return to nature," etc.—derived from these earlier writings, 51; not properly "Socialist," but individualist or anarchist, 52. Civilisation, its elements, 53-56; city life and the love of nature, 56-59. Truth and falsehood in the revolt against civilisation, 59. The cult of the savage, 60-62. The burden of civilised life, 63, 64. Types of Anarchists, 65, 66. Abstract thinking, 66-68. Antithesis between nature and man, 68-70; its falsehood, 70.
- IV. DE DIVISIONE NATURÆ 71-77
- I. Nature as the totality of what exists; (a) Natura naturans, (b) Natura naturata, 71-74. II. The "natural" as opposed to the human or artificial, 74. III. The "natural" as the original, 74, 75. IV. The "natural" as the normal or the ideal, 75. Confusion between these meanings, 75, 76. Another grouping of meanings suggested, 77.
- V. WHAT DETERMINES RIGHTS? 78-116
- Definition of a legal right, 78; of a moral right, 78-80. Natural rights not identical with moral rights; they are the more fundamental rights which would be guaranteed by a society which was as it ought to be, 80, 81. What determines this "ought"? (1) Authority? 82-85; (2) Nature, i.e. individual conscience or sentiment? 85-87; (3) Utility or Reason? 87.
- Conflicting interpretations of "the law of nature" illustrated from opinions about polygamy: Father Rickaby, 88-90; Grotius, 90; Locke, 90-92; Lorimer, 92, 93; Shelley, 93. Is Utility an equally uncertain guide? 94; defects of Benthamist Utilitarianism, 94-96. These defects disappear, if, instead of feelings of pleasure and pain taken abstractly, the Universal Ego or Reason be made the metaphysical basis of ethics, 96, 97. Transition from Individualist to Evolutionist Utilitarianism, 97-101. Rights dependent on Society, 101-103. The evolutionist manner of judging institutions, e.g. slavery, 103, 104; industrial competition, 104, 105. Advantage of appealing to reason and experience, rather than to "Nature," 105, 106.
- Some questions connected with the foregoing: Have the lower animals rights? 107-111. The notion of progress, 111-114. The place of individual rights (1) in political theory; (2) in constitutional law, 115, 116.

PART II.—PARTICULAR NATURAL RIGHTS.

CHAPTER

PAGES

VI. THE RIGHT OF LIFE 119-134

(a) The instinct of self-preservation, 119, 120. Does this give rise to a natural right in the individual against society? 120-122; or in the society, as a whole, against other societies? 122-124.

(b) Does the right to preserve imply the right to end life? Opinions on suicide, 124-126.

(c) The right of "enjoying" life, 127.

(d) Is there a right to be well-born? The rights of the unborn, 127-134.

VII. THE RIGHT OF LIBERTY: LIBERTY OF THOUGHT . . . 135-156

The terms "liberty" and "freedom," their ambiguity, 135-138. Difference between negative and positive liberty, 138, 139. Positive liberty cannot exist apart from the State, 139, 140. The formula of "equal liberty," 141, 142; difficulty in applying it as the principle of justice, 143-145. Limitation of individual liberty in the French Declarations of Rights, 145, 146. The limitation must be other than the equal liberty of other individuals, 146, 147.

Liberty of thought, in its literal sense, 147, 148; in the positive sense of intellectual freedom it implies the existence of a strong government, 148, 149. Religious and civil liberty not always found together, 149, 150. Liberty of the press in the French Constitutions, 150, 151; in England dependent solely on the abolition of the censorship and on trial by jury, 151-155. Moral value of a formal declaration of the right, 156.

VIII. TOLERATION 157-209

The term "Toleration" defended, 157-159. What is "persecution"? 159, 160. Some limits to liberty of speech and writing, as well as of action, required everywhere, 161. The teaching of Thomas Aquinas and his followers on the repression of heresy, 161-164; Father Rickaby on "liberty of opinion," 164-167.

The grounds of persecution: (1) tribal, 168; (2) political, 168, 169; (3) theological—to defend the truth: Christianity and persecution, 169-173. Locke's Letters on Toleration do not meet the real principles of conscientious persecutors, 173-175; Locke's limits to toleration, 175, 176; compared with Rousseau's "Civil religion," 176. Political character of persecution in the early Roman Empire and in Elizabethan England, 176-178. Comparison of the Swiss and American constitutional guarantees of religious liberty, 178-180. Extent of practical liberty in Great Britain, 180, 181. (4) Social grounds of persecution hardly separable from the others, 181, 182.

Need of an historical spirit in judging of the past, 182. Growth of the practice of toleration, 183. The principle of toleration implies a change of opinion as to what is socially expedient or as to what is essential in religion, 184, 185. Principles of intolerance may coexist with mildness in practice, 185.

Ought the intolerant to be tolerated?—Opinions of Locke, Rousseau, Renan, 185–188. Limits of toleration, 188.

Toleration in matters affecting morality, 189–198. Difference between religious belief and morality, 189; difficulty of estimating moral superiority, 190; the test of seriousness in literature and art, 191–193; new ideas must struggle, 193; what minorities may fairly claim, 194, 195. The duty of private judgment, 196. The claims of Authority, 197.

NOTE A.—Religious Persecution and Toleration: Some Historical Illustrations 198–202

Hallam on the persecutions of Elizabeth's reign, 198; Burleigh's defence of his treatment of Roman Catholics, 198, 199; Hallam's five degrees of religious persecution, 200. The Declaration of Breda, 200. The "Instrument of Government," 200. Roger Williams, the champion of "soul-liberty" in principle and practice, 201, 202.

NOTE B.—Measures for Suppressing Mormonism in the United States 202–209

Reasons for treating of the question, 202, 203. Legislation against polygamy, 204–207. Test-oath imposed on voters, 207–209.

IX. THE RIGHTS OF PUBLIC MEETING AND ASSOCIATION 210–226

The right of public meeting in France, 210, 211; in Belgium, 211. The attitude of English law to public meetings, 211–214. Voluntary associations, how different from the State, 214–217. The family, 217; the Church (the "liberty of the Church," "free Churches"), 218–221; trading corporations, 221; Trade-Unions, 221–225. Problems for a Socialistic State, 224–226.

X. FREEDOM OF CONTRACT, NATIONAL FREEDOM, ETC. 227–237

No absolute right of contract, 227. Must the State enforce all the contracts it has permitted? 228. The United States constitution prohibits the States from impairing contract-obligations, 229.

The droit du travail, 229, 230; the droit au travail, 230, 231.

National freedom or independence, 232. Is there a right of aggression? 233, 234. "International burglaries," 234. No general principle of non-intervention, 235. The right to restrict immigration, 236, 237.

CHAPTER	PAGES
XI. RESISTANCE TO OPPRESSION	238-248
The right of resistance in the French and American Declarations, 238, 239. A constitutional right of rebellion belongs to a very primitive type of political existence, 239, 240. The Pope as judge of tyrants, 240. Constitutions regarded as compacts, 241; the South Carolina Declaration of Independence, 241, 242. The ethics of rebellion, 243.
XII. EQUALITY	244-262
Natural right of equality in French and American Declarations, 244. The natural equality of man according to Hobbes, 245; and Locke, 246. The natural inequality of man not always an argument for political inequality, 246-248. The idea of equality aristocratic in origin, 248. Bentham assumes equality, 249. Hedonist Utilitarianism in its strict form might justify inequality in some cases, equality in others, 249-251. Ethics based on human rationality, can regard men, quod men, as all potentially sharers in the same ideals, 251, 252. Kant's formula for the moral law, 252, 253. Every human being a "person," if humanity is regarded as a possible society, 253, 254. The ideal of equality, how far due to Christianity, 254. Equality before the law, 255. Equality in political rights, 255. Property qualifications for the suffrage, 255, 256; educational qualifications, 256, 257. The suffrage as a duty: compulsory voting, 257, 258. Negative equality, i.e. free competition, accentuates inequality of social condition, 258. Equality of social condition would require State-interference with the family, 259, 260; still more would equality of the sexes, if it included the economic independence of women, 260, 261. Plato's ideal—the State as one family, 262.
XIII. THE RIGHT OF PROPERTY	263-271
Ambiguity in the phrase "right of property." What does Property imply? 263, 264. The definitions and limitations of property rights in the rival constitutions of Kansas (1857-58), 264; in the French Declarations, 265; in the United States Constitution, 265. The theory basing property on occupation, 266-268. Locke's theory, basing property on labour, 268-271; Mr. Henry George versus the Pope, 270, 271.
XIV. THE RIGHT OF PURSUING AND OBTAINING HAPPINESS	272-286
"Pursuing" and "obtaining" distinguished; Happiness as the end of government, 272-275. Conclusion: Aim not directly practical, but scientific or philosophical, i.e. critical, 275, 276. The Socialistic tendencies of our age, 276, 277. Progress must be gradual, 277-282; "bourgeois" interest in civilisation,

278; need of international solidarity, 279; fallacious remedies, 280; continued importance of political questions, 280, 281; moral progress must accompany political, 281, 282; delusion of finality, 282. Objection of the pessimist, 282-284. Faith in the rationality of the world is implied in social effort, 284, 285; and should exclude contempt for the past and present, 285, 286.

APPENDIX.

THE VIRGINIAN DECLARATION OF RIGHTS—June 12, 1776.	287
EXTRACT FROM THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE— July 4, 1776	289
FRENCH DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF 1789 (Constitution of 1791), WITH PAINE'S TRANSLATION	290
FRENCH DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF 1793	294
FRENCH DECLARATION OF RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF 1795	297
PREAMBLE TO FRENCH CONSTITUTION OF 1848	299
INDEX	301