BARUCH SPINOZA

TRACTATUS THEOLOGICO-POLITICUS

Preface	49
1. Of Prophecy	59
2. Of the Prophets	73
3. Of the vocation of the Hebrews, and whether the gift of prophecy was peculiar to them	88
4. Of the Divine Law	101
5. Of the reason for the institution of ceremonial obser- vances. Belief in the Biblical narratives: in what way and for whom it is necessary	112
6. Of miracles	124
7. Of the interpretation of Scripture	140
8. In which it is shown that the Pentateuch and the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel and Kings were not writ- ten by themselves. The question of their authorship is considered. Was there one author, or several, and who were they?	161
9. An enquiry into further matters relating to these same books, namely, whether Ezra gave them a final revision, and whether the marginal notes found in the Hebrew codices were variant readings	173
10. An examination of the remaining books of the Old Testament by the same method as was used with the previous books	186
11. An enquiry as to whether the Apostles wrote their Epis- tles as apostles and prophets, or as teachers. The function of the Apostles is explained	197
12. Of the true original of the Divine Law. The reason why

Scripture is called holy and the Word of God. It is shown that Scripture, in so far as it contains the Word of God, has come down to us uncorrupted	205
13. It is shown that Scripture teaches only very simple doctrines and inculcates nothing but obedience, and that concerning the nature of God it teaches only what men can imitate by a definite code of conduct	214
14. An analysis of faith, the faithful, and the fundamental principles of faith. Faith is finally set apart from philosophy	220
15. It is demonstrated that theology is not ancillary to reason, nor reason to theology. How we are convinced of the authority of Holy Scripture	228
16. The basis of the state; the natural and civil right of the individual, and the right of sovereigns	237
17. It is demonstrated that nobody can, or need, transfer all his rights to the sovereign power. An account of the Hebrew state as it was in the time of Moses, and after his death before the institution of monarchy, and its success. Finally, the reasons why it came about that the theocratic state fell, and could scarcely have continued without civil strife	250
18. From the commonwealth of the Hebrews and their history some political principles are deduced	272
19. It is shown that the right over matters of religion is vested entirely in the sovereign, and that the external forms of worship should be such as accord with the peace of the commonwealth, if we would serve God aright	280
20. It is shown that in a free commonwealth every man may think as he pleases, and say what he thinks	291
