

CONTENTS OF VOL. II.

	PAGE
ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE UNDERSTANDING	1
Of the ordinary objects of men's desires	3
Of the true and final good	6
Certain rules of life	7
Of the four modes of perception	8
Of the best mode of perception	10
Of the instruments of the intellect, or true ideas	12
Answers to objections	16
First part of method. Distinction of true ideas from fictitious ideas	18
And from false ideas	24
Of doubt	29
Of memory and forgetfulness	31
Mental hindrances from words—and from the popular confusion of ready imagination with distinct understanding	33
Second part of method. Its object, the acquisition of clear and distinct ideas	34
Its means, good definitions. Conditions of definition	35
How to define the understanding	38
THE ETHICS	43
Part I. Concerning God	45
Definitions	45
Axioms	46
Prop. I. Substance is by nature prior to its modifications	46
Prop. II. Two substances, whose attributes are different, have nothing in common	46
Prop. III. Things, which have nothing in common, cannot be one the cause of the other	47
Prop. IV. Two or more distinct things are distinguished one from the other either by the difference of the attributes of the substances, or by the difference of their modifications	47
Prop. V. There cannot exist in the universe two or more substances having the same nature or attribute	47
Prop. VI. One substance cannot be produced by another substance	47
Prop. VII. Existence belongs to the nature of substance	48
Prop. VIII. Every substance is necessarily infinite,	48

	PAGE
Prop. IX. The more reality or being a thing has, the greater the number of its attributes	50
Prop. X. Each particular attribute of the one substance must be conceived through itself	50
Prop. XI. God, or substance consisting of infinite attributes, of which each expresses eternal and infinite essentiality, necessarily exists	51
Prop. XII. No attribute of substance can be conceived, from which it would follow that substance can be divided	54
Prop. XIII. Substance absolutely infinite is indivisible	54
Prop. XIV. Besides God no substance can be granted or conceived	54
Prop. XV. Whatsoever is, is in God, and without God nothing can be, or be conceived	55
Prop. XVI. From the necessity of the divine nature must follow an infinite number of things in infinite ways—that is, all things which fall within the sphere of infinite intellect	59
Prop. XVII. God acts solely by the laws of his own nature, and is not constrained by anyone	59
Prop. XVIII. God is the indwelling and not the transient cause of all things	62
Prop. XIX. God and all the attributes of God are eternal	62
Prop. XX. The existence of God and his essence are one and the same	63
Prop. XXI. All things, which follow from the absolute nature of any attribute of God, must always exist and be infinite, or in other words, are eternal and infinite through the said attribute	63
Prop. XXII. Whatever follows from any attribute of God, in so far as it is modified by a modification, which exists necessarily and as infinite through the said attribute, must also exist necessarily and as infinite	65
Prop. XXIII. Every mode, which exists both necessarily and as infinite, must necessarily follow either from the absolute nature of some attribute of God, or from an attribute modified by a modification, which exists necessarily and as infinite	65
Prop. XXIV. The essence of things produced by God does not involve existence	65
Prop. XXV. God is the efficient cause not only of the existence of things, but also of their essence	66
Prop. XXVI. A thing, which is conditioned to act in a particular manner, has necessarily been thus conditioned by God; and that which has not been conditioned by God cannot condition itself to act	66
Prop. XXVII. A thing, which has been conditioned by God to act in a particular way, cannot render itself unconditioned	66
Prop. XXVIII. Every individual thing, or everything which is finite and has a conditioned existence, cannot exist or be conditioned to act, unless it be conditioned for existence and action by a cause other than itself, which also is finite and has a conditioned existence; and likewise this cause cannot in its

	PAGE
turn exist or be conditioned to act, unless it be conditioned for existence and action by another cause, which also is finite and has a conditioned existence, and so on to infinity	67
Prop. XXIX. Nothing in the universe is contingent, but all things are conditioned to exist and operate in a particular manner by the necessity of the divine nature.	68
Prop. XXX. Intellect, in function finite, or in function infinite, must comprehend the attributes of God and the modifications of God, and nothing else	69
Prop. XXXI. The intellect in function, whether finite or infinite, as will, desire, love, &c., should be referred to passive nature, and not to active nature	69
Prop. XXXII. Will cannot be called a free cause, but only a necessary cause	70
Prop. XXXIII. Things could not have been brought into being by God in any manner or in any order different from that which has in fact obtained	70
Prop. XXXIV. God's power is identical with his essence	74
Prop. XXXV. Whatsoever we conceive to be in the power of God, necessarily exists	74
Prop. XXXVI. There is no cause from whose nature some effect does not follow	74
APPENDIX	74
Part II. Of the Nature and Origin of the Mind	82
Preface	82
Definitions	82
Axioms	83
Prop. I. Thought is an attribute of God, or God is a thinking thing	83
Prop. II. Extension is an attribute of God, or God is an extended thing	84
Prop. III. In God there is necessarily the idea, not only of his essence, but also of all things which necessarily follow from his essence	84
Prop. IV. The idea of God, from which an infinite number of things follow in infinite ways, can only be one	85
Prop. V. The actual being of ideas owns God as its cause, only in so far as he is considered as a thinking thing, not in so far as he is unfolded in any other attribute; that is, the ideas both of the attributes of God and of particular things do not own as their efficient cause their objects, or the things perceived, but God himself, in so far as he is a thinking thing	85
Prop. VI. The modes of any given attribute are caused by God, in so far as he is considered through the attribute of which they are modes, and not in so far as he is considered through any other attribute	86
Prop. VII. The order and connection of ideas is the same as the order and connection of things	86
Prop. VIII. The ideas of particular things, or of modes, that

	PAGE
do not exist, must be comprehended in the infinite idea of God, in the same way as the formal essences of particular things or modes are contained in the attributes of God	87
Prop. IX. The idea of an individual thing actually existing is caused by God, not in so far as he is infinite, but in so far as he is considered as affected by another idea of a thing actually existing, of which he is the cause, in so far as he is affected by a third idea, and so on to infinity	88
Prop. X. The being of substance does not appertain to the essence of man—in other words, substance does not constitute the actual being of man	89
Prop. XI. The first element, which constitutes the actual being of the human mind, is the idea of some particular thing actually existing	90
Prop. XII. Whatsoever comes to pass in the object of the idea, which constitutes the human mind, must be perceived by the human mind, or there will necessarily be an idea in the human mind of the said occurrence. That is, if the object of the idea constituting the human mind be a body, nothing can take place in that body without being perceived by the mind	91
Prop. XIII. The object of the idea constituting the human mind is the body, in other words a certain mode of extension which actually exists, and nothing else	92
Digression on the nature of bodies—Axioms I., II. Lemmas I.—III.	93
Axioms I., II.	94
Definition—Axiom III.—Lemmas IV., V.	95
Lemmas VI., VII.	96
Postulates	97
Prop. XIV. The human mind is capable of perceiving a great number of things, and is so, in proportion as its body is capable of receiving a great number of impressions	97
Prop. XV. The idea, which constitutes the actual being of the human mind, is not simple, but compounded of a great number of ideas	97
Prop. XVI. The idea of every mode, in which the human body is affected by external bodies, must involve the nature of the human body, and also the nature of the external body	98
Prop. XVII. If the human body is affected in a manner which involves the nature of any external body, the human mind will regard the said external body as actually existing, or as present to itself, until the human body be affected in such a way as to exclude the existence of the said external body	98
Prop. XVIII. If the human body has once been affected by two or more bodies at the same time, when the mind afterwards imagines any of them, it will straightway remember the others also	100
Prop. XIX. The human mind has no knowledge of the body, and does not know it to exist, save through the ideas of the modifications, whereby the body is affected	101

	PAGE
Prop. XX. The idea or knowledge of the human mind is also in God, following in God in the same manner, and being referred to God in the same manner, as the idea or knowledge of the human body	102
Prop. XXI. This idea of the mind is united to the mind, in the same way as the mind is united to the body	102
Prop. XXII. The human mind perceives not only the modifications of the body, but also the ideas of such modifications	103
Prop. XXIII. The mind does not know itself, except in so far as it perceives the ideas of the modifications of the body	103
Prop. XXIV. The human mind does not involve an adequate knowledge of the parts composing the human body	104
Prop. XXV. The idea of each modification of the human body does not involve an adequate knowledge of the external body	104
Prop. XXVI. The human mind does not perceive any external body as actually existing, except through the ideas of the modifications of its own body	105
Prop. XXVII. The idea of each modification of the human body does not involve an adequate knowledge of the human body itself	105
Prop. XXVIII. The ideas of the modifications of the human body, in so far as they have reference only to the human mind, are not clear and distinct, but confused	105
Prop. XXIX. The idea of the idea of each modification of the human body does not involve an adequate knowledge of the human mind	106
Prop. XXX. We can only have a very inadequate knowledge of the duration of our body	107
Prop. XXXI. We can only have a very inadequate knowledge of the duration of particular things external to ourselves	107
Prop. XXXII. All ideas, in so far as they are referred to God, are true	108
Prop. XXXIII. There is nothing positive in ideas, which causes them to be called false	108
Prop. XXXIV. Every idea, which in us is absolute or adequate and perfect, is true	108
Prop. XXXV. Falsity consists in the privation of knowledge, which inadequate, fragmentary, or confused ideas involve	108
Prop. XXXVI. Inadequate or confused ideas follow by the same necessity, as adequate or clear and distinct ideas	109
Prop. XXXVII. That which is common to all, and is equally in a part and in the whole, does not constitute the essence of any particular thing	109
Prop. XXXVIII. Those things, which are common to all, and are equally in a part and in the whole, cannot be conceived except adequately	109
Prop. XXXIX. That, which is common to and a property of the human body and such other bodies as are wont to affect the human body, and which is present equally in each part of

	PAGE
either or in the whole, will be represented by an adequate idea in the mind	110
Prop. XL. Whatsoever ideas in the mind follow from ideas, which are therein adequate, are also themselves adequate	111
Prop. XLI. Opinion is the only source of falsity, reason and intuition are necessarily true	114
Prop. XLII. Reason and intuition, not opinion, teach us to distinguish the true from the false	114
Prop. XLIII. He, who has a true idea, simultaneously knows that he has a true idea, and cannot doubt of the truth of the thing perceived	114
Prop. XLIV. It is not in the nature of reason to regard things as contingent, but as necessary	116
Prop. XLV. Every idea of every body, or of every particular thing actually existing, necessarily involves the eternal and infinite essence of God	117
Prop. XLVI. The knowledge of the eternal and infinite essence of God, which every idea involves, is adequate and perfect	118
Prop. XLVII. The human mind has an adequate knowledge of the eternal and infinite essence of God	118
Prop. XLVIII. In the mind there is no absolute or free will; but the mind is determined to wish this or that by a cause, which has also been determined by another cause, and this last by another cause, and so on to infinity	119
Prop. XLIX. There is in the mind no volition, or affirmation and negation, save that which an idea, inasmuch as it is an idea, involves	120
Part III. On the Origin and Nature of the Emotions	128
Definitions	129
Postulates	130
Prop. I. Our mind is in certain cases active, and in certain cases passive. In so far as it has adequate ideas, it is necessarily active, and in so far as it has inadequate ideas, it is necessarily passive	130
Prop. II. Body cannot determine mind to think, neither can mind determine body to motion or rest, or any state different from these, if such there be	131
Prop. III. The activities of the mind arise solely from adequate ideas; the passive states of the mind depend solely on inadequate ideas	135
Prop. IV. Nothing can be destroyed, except by a cause external to itself	136
Prop. V. Things are naturally contrary, that is, cannot exist in the same object, in so far as one is capable of destroying the other	136
Prop. VI. Everything, in so far as it is in itself, endeavours to persist in its own being	136
Prop. VII. The endeavour, wherewith everything endeavours to persist in its own being is nothing else but the actual essence of the thing in question	136

	PAGE
Prop. VIII. The endeavour, whereby a thing endeavours to persist in its being, involves no finite time, but an indefinite time	137
Prop. IX. The mind, both in so far as it has clear and distinct ideas, and also in so far as it has confused ideas, endeavours to persist in its being for an indefinite period, and of this endeavour it is conscious	137
Prop. X. An idea, which excludes the existence of our body cannot be postulated in our mind, but is contrary thereto	138
Prop. XI. Whatsoever increases or diminishes, helps or hinders the power of activity in our body, the idea thereof increases or diminishes, helps or hinders the power of thought in our mind	138
Prop. XII. The mind, as far as it can, endeavours to conceive those things, which increase or help the power of activity in the body	139
Prop. XIII. When the mind conceives things which diminish or hinder the body's power of activity, it endeavours, as far as possible, to remember things, which exclude the existence of the first-named things	139
Prop. XIV. If the mind has once been affected by two emotions at the same time, it will, whenever it is afterwards affected by one of the two, be also affected by the other	140
Prop. XV. Anything can, accidentally, be the cause of pleasure, pain, or desire	140
Prop. XVI. Simply from the fact that we conceive, that a given object has some point of resemblance with another object, which is wont to affect the mind pleasurablely or painfully, although the point of resemblance be not the efficient cause of the said emotions, we shall still regard the first-named object with love or hate.	141
Prop. XVII. If we conceive that a thing, which is wont to affect us painfully, has any point of resemblance with another thing, which is wont to affect us with an equally strong emotion of pleasure, we shall hate the first-named thing, and at the same time we shall love it	142
Prop. XVIII. A man is as much affected pleasurablely or painfully by the image of a thing past or future, as by the image of a thing present	143
Prop. XIX. He, who conceives that the object of his love is destroyed, will feel pain; if he conceives that it is preserved, he will feel pleasure	144
Prop. XX. He who conceives that the object of his hate is destroyed, will feel pleasure.	144
Prop. XXI. He who conceives that the object of his love is affected pleasurablely or painfully, will himself be affected pleasurablely or painfully; and the one or the other emotion will be greater or less in the lover, according as it is greater or less in the thing loved.	145
Prop. XXII. If we conceive that anything pleasurablely affects some object of our love, we shall be affected with love towards that thing. Contrariwise, if we conceive that it affects an object

	PAGE
of our love painfully, we shall be affected with hatred towards it	145
Prop. XXIII. He who conceives that an object of his hatred is painfully affected, will feel pleasure. Contrariwise, if he thinks that the said object is pleasurable affected, he will feel pain. Each of these emotions will be greater or less, according as its contrary is greater or less in the object of hatred	146
Prop. XXIV. If we conceive that any one pleasurable affects an object of our hate, we shall feel hatred towards him also. If we conceive that he painfully affects the said object, we shall feel love towards him	146
Prop. XXV. We endeavour to affirm, concerning ourselves and concerning what we love, everything that we conceive to affect pleasurable ourselves or the loved object. Contrariwise, we endeavour to negative everything, which we conceive to affect painfully ourselves or the loved object	147
Prop. XXVI. We endeavour to affirm, concerning that which we hate, everything which we conceive to affect it painfully; and contrariwise, we endeavour to deny concerning it everything which we conceive to affect it pleasurable	147
Prop. XXVII. By the very fact that we conceive a thing, which is like ourselves, and which we have not regarded with any emotion, to be affected with any emotion, we are ourselves affected with a like emotion	148
Prop. XXVIII. We endeavour to bring about whatsoever we conceive to conduce to pleasure; but we endeavour to remove or destroy whatsoever we conceive to be truly repugnant thereto, or to conduce to pain	149
Prop. XXIX. We shall also endeavour to do whatsoever we conceive men to regard with pleasure, and contrariwise we shall shrink from doing that which we conceive men to shrink from	149
Prop. XXX. If any one has done something which he conceives as affecting other men pleasurable, he will be affected by pleasure, accompanied by the idea of himself as a cause; in other words, he will regard himself with pleasure. On the other hand, if he has done anything which he regards as affecting others painfully, he will regard himself with pain	150
Prop. XXXI. If we conceive that anyone loves, desires, or hates anything which we love, desire, or hate, we shall thereupon regard the thing in question with more steadfast love, &c. On the contrary, if we think, that anyone shrinks from something that we love, we shall undergo vacillation of soul	151
Prop. XXXII. If we conceive that anyone takes delight in something, which only one person can possess, we shall endeavour to bring it about, that the man in question shall not gain possession thereof	152
Prop. XXXIII. When we love a thing similar to ourselves, we endeavour, as far as we can, to bring it about, that it should love us in return	152
Prop. XXXIV. The greater the emotion with which we con-

	PAGE
ceive a loved object to be affected towards us, the greater will be our complacency	153
Prop. XXXV. If anyone conceives, that an object of his love joins itself to another with closer bonds of friendship than he himself has attained to, he will be affected with hatred towards the loved object and with envy towards his rival	153
Prop. XXXVI. He who remembers a thing, in which he has once taken delight, desires to possess it under the same circumstances as when he first took delight therein	154
Prop. XXXVII. Desire arising through pain or pleasure, hatred or love, is greater in proportion as the emotion is greater	155
Prop. XXXVIII. If a man has begun to hate an object of his love, so that love is thoroughly destroyed, he will, causes being equal, regard it with more hatred than if he had never loved it, and his hatred will be in proportion to the strength of his former love	155
Prop. XXXIX. He who hates anyone will endeavour to do him an injury, unless he fears that a greater injury will thereby accrue to himself; on the other hand, he who loves anyone will, by the same law, seek to benefit him	156
Prop. XL. He, who conceives himself to be hated by another, and believes that he has given him no cause for hatred, will hate that other in return	157
Prop. XLI. If anyone conceives that he is loved by another, and believes that he has given no cause for such love, he will love that other in return	158
Prop. XLII. He, who has conferred a benefit on anyone from motives of love or honour, will feel pain, if he sees that the benefit is received without gratitude	158
Prop. XLIII. Hatred is increased by being reciprocated, and can on the other hand be destroyed by love	159
Prop. XLIV. Hatred which is completely vanquished by love, passes into love; and love is thereupon greater, than if hatred had not preceded it	159
Prop. XLV. If a man conceives, that anyone similar to himself hates anything also similar to himself, which he loves, he will hate that person	160
Prop. XLVI. If a man has been affected pleurably or painfully by anyone of a class or nation different from his own, and if the pleasure or pain has been accompanied by the idea of the said stranger as cause, under the general category of the class or nation: the man will feel love or hatred not only to the individual stranger, but also to the whole class or nation, whereto he belongs	160
Prop. XLVII. Joy arising from the fact, that anything we hate is destroyed or suffers other injury, is never unaccompanied by a certain pain in us	160
Prop. XLVIII. Love or hatred towards, for instance, Peter is destroyed, if the pleasure involved in the former, or the pain involved in the latter emotion, be associated with the idea of

	PAGE
another cause; and will be diminished in proportion as we conceive Peter not to have been the sole cause of either emotion	161
Prop. XLIX. Love or hatred towards a thing, which we conceive to be free, must, other conditions being similar, be greater, than if it were felt towards a thing acting by necessity.	161
Prop. L. Anything whatever can be, accidentally, a cause of hope or fear	162
Prop. LI. Different men may be differently affected by the same object, and the same man may be differently affected at different times by the same object	163
Prop. LII. An object, which we have formerly seen in conjunction with others, and do not conceive to have any property that is not common to many, will not be regarded by us for so long as an object, which we conceive to have some property peculiar to itself	164
Prop. LIII. When the mind regards itself and its own power of activity, it feels pleasure; and that pleasure is greater in proportion to the distinctness, wherewith it conceives itself and its own power of activity	165
Prop. LIV. The mind endeavours to conceive only such things as assert its power of activity	166
Prop. LV. When the mind contemplates its own weakness, it feels pain thereat	166
Prop. LVI. There are as many kinds of pleasure, of pain, of desire, and of every emotion compounded of these, such as vacillations of spirit, or derived from these, such as love, hatred, hope, fear, &c., as there are kinds of objects, whereby we are affected	168
Prop. LVII. Any emotion of a given individual differs from the emotion of another individual, only in so far as the essence of the one individual differs from the essence of the other	169
Prop. LVIII. Besides pleasure and desire, which are passivities or passions, there are other emotions derived from pleasure and desire, which are attributable to us, in so far as we are active	171
Prop. LIX. Among all the emotions attributable to the mind as active, there are none which cannot be referred to pleasure or pain	171
Definitions of the Emotions	173
General Definition of the Emotions	185
Part IV. Of Human Bondage or the Strength of the Emotions	187
Preface	187
Definitions	190
Axiom	191
Prop. I. No positive quality possessed by a false idea is removed by the presence of what is true in virtue of its being true	191
Prop. II. We are only passive in so far as we are a part of Nature, which cannot be conceived by itself without other parts.	192

	PAGE
Prop. III. The force whereby a man persists in existing is limited, and is infinitely surpassed by the power of external causes	193
Prop. IV. It is impossible, that man should not be a part of Nature, or that he should be capable of undergoing no changes, save such as can be understood through his nature only as their adequate cause	193
Prop. V. The power and increase of every passion, and its persistence in existing are not defined by the power, whereby we ourselves endeavour to persist in existing, but by the power of an external cause compared with our own	194
Prop. VI. The force of any passion or emotion can overcome the rest of a man's activities or power, so that the emotion becomes obstinately fixed to him	194
Prop. VII. An emotion can only be controlled or destroyed by another emotion contrary thereto, and with more power for controlling emotion	194
Prop. VIII. The knowledge of good and evil is nothing else, but the emotions of pleasure or pain, in so far as we are conscious thereof	195
Prop. IX. An emotion, whereof we conceive the cause to be with us at the present time, is stronger than if we did not conceive the cause to be with us	196
Prop. X. Towards something future, which we conceive as close at hand, we are affected more intensely, than if we conceive that its time for existence is separated from the present by a longer interval; so too by the remembrance of what we conceive to have not long passed away we are affected more intensely, than if we conceive that it has long passed away	196
Prop. XI. An emotion towards that which we conceive as necessary is, when other conditions are equal, more intense than an emotion towards that which is possible, or contingent, or non-necessary	197
Prop. XII. An emotion towards a thing, which we know not to exist at the present time, and which we conceive is possible, is more intense, other things being equal, than an emotion towards a thing contingent	197
Prop. XIII. Emotion towards a thing contingent, which we know not to exist in the present, is, other conditions being equal, fainter than an emotion towards a thing past	198
Prop. XIV. A true knowledge of good and evil cannot check any emotion by virtue of being true, but only in so far as it is considered as an emotion	198
Prop. XV. Desire arising from the knowledge of good and evil can be quenched or checked by many other desires arising from the emotions, whereby we are assailed	198
Prop. XVI. Desire arising from the knowledge of good and evil, in so far as such knowledge regards what is future, may be more easily controlled or quenched, than the desire for what is agreeable at the present moment	199

	PAGE
Prop. XVII. Desire arising from the true knowledge of good and evil, in so far as such knowledge is concerned with what is contingent, can be controlled far more easily still, than desire for things that are at present	199
Prop. XVIII. Desire arising from pleasure is, other things being equal, stronger than desire arising from pain	200
Prop. XIX. Every man, by the laws of his nature, necessarily desires or shrinks from that which he deems to be good or bad	202
Prop. XX. The more every man endeavours and is able to seek what is useful to him, in other words to preserve his own being, the more is he endowed with virtue; on the contrary, in proportion as a man neglects to seek what is useful to him, that is, to preserve his own being, he is wanting in power	202
Prop. XXI. No one can rightly desire to be blessed, to act rightly, and to live rightly, without at the same time wishing to be, to act, and to live, in other words, to actually exist	203
Prop. XXII. No virtue can be conceived as prior to this endeavour to preserve one's own being	203
Prop. XXIII. Man, in so far as he is determined to a particular action because he has inadequate ideas, cannot be absolutely said to act in obedience to virtue; he can only be so described, in so far as he is determined for the action, because he understands	204
Prop. XXIV. To act absolutely in obedience to virtue, is in us the same thing as to act, to live, or to preserve one's being (these three terms are identical in meaning) in accordance with the dictate of reason on the basis of seeking what is useful to one's self	204
Prop. XXV. No one wishes to preserve his being for the sake of anything else	204
Prop. XXVI. Whatsoever we endeavour in obedience to reason is nothing further than to understand; neither does the mind, in so far as it makes use of reason, judge anything to be useful to it, save such things as are conducive to understanding	205
Prop. XXVII. We know nothing to be certainly good or evil, save such things as really conduce to understanding, or such as are able to hinder us from understanding	205
Prop. XXVIII. The mind's highest good is the knowledge of God, and the mind's highest virtue is to know God	205
Prop. XXIX. No individual thing, which is entirely different from our own nature, can help or check our power of activity, and absolutely nothing can do us good or harm, unless it has something in common with our nature	206
Prop. XXX. A thing cannot be bad for us through the quality which it has in common with our nature, but it is bad for us, in so far as it is contrary to our nature	206
Prop. XXXI. In so far as a thing is in harmony with our nature, it is necessarily good	207

	PAGE
Prop. XXXII. In so far as men are a prey to passion, they cannot, in that respect, be said to be naturally in harmony	207
Prop. XXXIII. Men can differ in nature, in so far as they are assailed by those emotions, which are passions or passive states; and to this extent one and the same man is variable and inconstant	208
Prop. XXXIV. In so far as men are assailed by emotions which are passions, they can be contrary one to another	208
Prop. XXXV. In so far only as men live in obedience to reason, do they always necessarily agree in nature	209
Prop. XXXVI. The highest good of those who follow virtue is common to all, and therefore all can equally rejoice therein	211
Prop. XXXVII. The good, which every man who follows after virtue desires for himself, he will also desire for other men, and so much the more, in proportion as he has a greater knowledge of God	211
Prop. XXXVIII. Whatsoever disposes the human body, so as to render it capable of being affected in an increased number of ways, or of affecting external bodies in an increased number of ways, is useful to man; and is so, in proportion as the body is thereby rendered more capable of being affected or of affecting other bodies in an increased number of ways; contrariwise, whatsoever renders the body less capable in this respect is hurtful to man	215
Prop. XXXIX. Whatsoever brings about the preservation of the proportion of motion and rest, which the parts of the human body mutually possess, is good; contrariwise, whatsoever causes a change in such proportion is bad	215
Prop. XL. Whatsoever conduces to man's social life, or causes men to live together in harmony, is useful, whereas whatsoever brings discord into a State is bad	216
Prop. XLI. Pleasure in itself is not bad but good; contrariwise, pain in itself is bad	217
Prop. XLII. Mirth cannot be excessive, but is always good; contrariwise, Melancholy is always bad	217
Prop. XLIII. Stimulation may be excessive and bad; on the other hand, grief may be good, in so far as stimulation or pleasure is bad	217
Prop. XLIV. Love and desire may be excessive	218
Prop. XLV. Hatred can never be good	218
Prop. XLVI. He, who lives under the guidance of reason, endeavours, as far as possible, to render back love, or kindness, for other men's hatred, anger, contempt, etc., towards him	220
Prop. XLVII. Emotions of hope and fear cannot be in themselves good	220
Prop. XLVIII. The emotions of over-esteem and disparagement are always bad	221
Prop. XLIX. Over-esteem is apt to render its object proud	221
Prop. L. Pity, in a man who lives under the guidance of reason, is in itself bad and useless	221

	PAGE
Prop. LI. Approval is not repugnant to reason, but can agree therewith and arise therefrom	222
Prop. LII. Self-approval may arise from reason, and that which arises from reason is the highest possible	222
Prop. LIII. Humility is not a virtue, or does not arise from reason	223
Prop. LIV. Repentance is not a virtue, or does not arise from reason, but he who repents of an action is doubly wretched or infirm	223
Prop. LV. Extreme pride or dejection indicates extreme ignorance of self	224
Prop. LVI. Extreme pride or dejection indicates extreme infirmity of spirit	224
Prop. LVII. The proud man delights in the company of flatterers and parasites, but hates the company of the high-minded	224
Prop. LVIII. Honour (gloria) is not repugnant to reason, but may arise therefrom	226
Prop. LIX. To all the actions, whereto we are determined by emotions, wherein the mind is passive, we can be determined without emotion by reason	227
Prop. LX. Desire arising from a pleasure or pain, that is, not attributable to the whole body, but only to one or certain parts thereof, is without utility in respect to man as a whole	228
Prop. LXI. Desire which springs from reason cannot be excessive	229
Prop. LXII. In so far as the mind conceives a thing under the dictate of reason, it is affected equally, whether the idea be of a thing present, past, or future	229
Prop. LXIII. He who is led by fear, and does good in order to escape evil, is not led by reason	230
Prop. LXIV. The knowledge of evil is an inadequate knowledge	231
Prop. LXV. Under the guidance of reason we should pursue the greater of two goods and the lesser of two evils	231
Prop. LXVI. We may, under the guidance of reason, seek a greater good in the future in preference to a lesser good in the present, and we may seek a lesser evil in the present in preference to a greater evil in the future	231
Prop. LXVII. A free man thinks of nothing less than of death; and his wisdom is a meditation not of death, but of life	232
Prop. LXVIII. If men were born free, they would, so long as they remained free, form no conception of good or evil	232
Prop. LXIX. The virtue of a free man is seen to be as great, when it declines dangers, as when it overcomes them	233
Prop. LXX. The free man, who lives among the ignorant, strives, as far as he can, to avoid receiving favours from them	234
Prop. LXXI. Only free men are thoroughly grateful, one to another	234

	PAGE
Prop. LXXII. The free man never acts fraudulently, but always in good faith	235
Prop. LXXIII. The man, who is guided by reason, is more free in a State, where he lives under a general system of law, than in solitude, where he is independent	235
Appendix on the Right Way of Life	236
Part V. On the Power of the Understanding, or of Human Freedom	244
Preface	244
Axioms	247
Prop. I. Even as thoughts and the ideas of things are arranged and associated in the mind, so are the modifications of the body, or the images of things precisely in the same way arranged and associated in the body	247
Prop. II. If we remove a disturbance of the spirit, or emotion, from the thought of an external cause, and unite it to other thoughts, then will the love or hatred towards that external cause, and also the vacillations of spirit, which arise from these emotions, be destroyed	248
Prop. III. An emotion, which is a passion, ceases to be a passion, as soon as we form a clear and distinct idea thereof	248
Prop. IV. There is no modification of the body, whereof we cannot form some clear and distinct conception	248
Prop. V. An emotion towards a thing which we conceive simply, and not as necessary, or as contingent, or as possible, is, other conditions being equal, greater than any other emotion	249
Prop. VI. The mind has greater power over the emotions, and is less subject thereto, in so far as it understands all things as necessary	250
Prop. VII. Emotions, which are aroused or spring from reason, if we take account of time, are stronger than those, which are attributable to particular objects, that we regard as absent	250
Prop. VIII. An emotion is stronger in proportion to the number of simultaneous concurrent causes whereby it is aroused	251
Prop. IX. An emotion, which is attributable to many and diverse causes, which the mind regards as simultaneous with the emotion itself, is less hurtful, and we are less subject thereto, and less affected towards each of its causes, than if it were a different and equally powerful emotion, attributable to fewer causes or to a single cause	251
Prop. X. So long as we are not assailed by emotions contrary to our nature, we have the power of arranging and associating the modifications of our body according to the intellectual order	252
Prop. XI. In proportion as a mental image is referred to more objects, so is it more frequent, or more often vivid, and affects the mind more	254
Prop. XII. The mental images of things are more easily as-

	PAGE
sociated with the images referred to things which we clearly and distinctly understand, than with others	254
Prop. XIII. A mental image is more often vivid, in proportion as it is associated with a greater number of other images	255
Prop. XIV. The mind can bring it about, that all bodily modifications or images of things may be referred to the idea of God	255
Prop. XV. He, who clearly and distinctly understands himself and his emotions, loves God, and so much the more in proportion as he more understands himself and his emotions	255
Prop. XVI. This love towards God must hold the chief place in the mind	255
Prop. XVII. God is without passions, neither is he affected by any emotion of pleasure or pain	255
Prop. XVIII. No one can hate God	256
Prop. XIX. He, who loves God, cannot endeavour, that God should love him in return	256
Prop. XX. This love towards God cannot be stained by the emotion of envy or jealousy; contrariwise, it is the more fostered, in proportion as we conceive a greater number of men to be joined to God by the same bond of love	256
Prop. XXI. The mind can only imagine anything, or remember what is past, while the body endures	259
Prop. XXII. Nevertheless in God there is necessarily an idea, which expresses the essence of this or that human body under the form of eternity	259
Prop. XXIII. The human mind cannot be absolutely destroyed with the body, but there remains of it something which is eternal	259
Prop. XXIV. The more we understand particular things, the more do we understand God	260
Prop. XXV. The highest endeavour of the mind, and the highest virtue, is to understand things by intuition	260
Prop. XXVI. In proportion as the mind is more capable of understanding things by intuition, it desires more so to understand things	260
Prop. XXVII. From intuition arises the highest possible mental acquiescence	261
Prop. XXVIII. The endeavour or desire to know things by intuition cannot arise from opinion, but from reason	261
Prop. XXIX. Whatsoever the mind understands under the form of eternity, it does not understand by virtue of conceiving the present actual existence of the body, but by virtue of conceiving the essence of the body under the form of eternity	261
Prop. XXX. Our mind, in so far as it knows itself and the body under the form of eternity, has to that extent necessarily a knowledge of God, and knows that it is in God, and is conceived through God	262
Prop. XXXI. Intuition depends on the mind, as its formal cause, in so far as the mind itself is eternal	262

	PAGE
Prop. XXXII. Whatsoever we understand by intuition, we take delight in, and our delight is accompanied by the idea of God as cause	263
Prop. XXXIII. The intellectual love of God, which arises from intuition, is eternal	263
Prop. XXXIV. The mind is, only while the body endures, subject to those emotions, which are attributable to passions	264
Prop. XXXV. God loves himself with an infinite intellectual love	264
Prop. XXXVI. The intellectual love of the mind towards God is that very love of God, whereby God loves himself, not in so far as he is infinite, but in so far as he can be explained through the essence of the human mind regarded under the form of eternity; in other words, the intellectual love of the mind towards God is part of the infinite love, wherewith God loves himself	264
Prop. XXXVII. There is nothing in nature, which is contrary to this intellectual love, or which can take it away	266
Prop. XXXVIII. In proportion as the mind understands more things by reason and intuition, it is less subject to those emotions which are evil, and stands in less fear of death	266
Prop. XXXIX. He, who possesses a body capable of the greatest number of activities, possesses a soul whereof the greatest part is eternal	267
Prop. XL. In proportion as each thing possesses more of perfection, so is it more active, and less passive; and, vice versâ, in proportion as it is more active, so is it more perfect	268
Prop. XLI. Even if we did not know that our mind is eternal, we should still consider as of primary importance piety and religion, and generally all things, which in Part IV. we showed to be attributable to courage and high-mindedness	268
Prop. XLII. Blessedness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue itself; neither do we rejoice therein, because we control our lusts, but, contrariwise, because we rejoice therein, we are able to control our lusts	270
SPINOZA'S CORRESPONDENCE (ABRIDGED)	273
Letters I.—XXV.A. (1661-1676.) Between Spinoza and Henry Oldenburg	275
Letters XXVI.—XXVIII. Between Spinoza and Simon de Vries	309
Letters XXIX., XXIX.A. (1663.) From Spinoza to Lewis Meyer	317
Letter XXX. (1664.) From Spinoza to Peter Balling	325
Letters XXXI.—XXXVIII. (1664-5.) Between Spinoza and William Blyenbergh	327
Letters XXXIX.—XLI. (1666.) From Spinoza to Christian Huyghens, on the unity of God	351
Letters XLI.A., XLII. (1665-6.) From Spinoza to a correspondent probably identified with John Bresser	358

	PAGE
Letter XLIII. (1666.) Spinoza to I. v. M. on a problem connected with games of chance (omitted).
Letters XLIV.—XLVI. (on scientific subjects, and omitted), and Letter XLVII. (1667-71.) From Spinoza to a correspondent probably identified with Jarig Jellis.	362
Letter XLVIII. (1671.) From Lambert de Velthuysen to Isaac Orobio against Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (omitted).
Letter XLIX. (1671.) Spinoza's answer to XLVIII., addressed to Isaac Orobio	364
Letter L. (1674.) From Spinoza to Jarig Jellis, on Hobbes, &c.	369
Letters LI., LII. (1671.) Between Spinoza and Leibnitz	370
Letters LIII., LIV. (1673.) Between Spinoza and Fabricius	373
Letters LV.—LX. (1674.) Between Spinoza and Hugo Boxel on ghosts	375
Letters LXI.—LXXII. (1674-6.) Between Spinoza, E. W. von Tschirnhausen, and G. H. Schaller	389
Letters LXXIII., LXXIV. (1675.) Between Spinoza and Albert Burgh	410
Letter LXXV. (1675?) From Spinoza to Lambert de Velthuysen	419